We once heard a colored Bishop deliver a most powerful address, in which he contrasted Victor Hugo with a modern Southern writer. He said Hugo found his characters among the humblest, and sought to find the crushed flower in the meanest human breast and develop it till it transformed the whole man or woman, while the modern writer sought to find the tiger in the noblest human breast, and drew it out till it pulled the man or woman down.

The average political hackwriter thinks it his duty to look only for something to criticize and never anything to praise.

The painter who would look only for the blotches which he could enlarge and exaggerate would never enroll his name among the immortals, while even the mediocre who painted only the beautiful would attract attention.
